Research Focus:

My research areas are spatial inequality (community and regional development), the sociology of agriculture/economic sociology, political sociology, and gender. Building from these areas, my research addresses a central theme: changes in the market and state and their impacts. In brief, I am concerned with the process of economic and political/governmental change and how it impacts socioeconomic inequality across regions, localities, households, and individuals; and in turn, how people respond to the market/state changes they experience, such as through political activism. The above research theme is developed through empirical studies that focus on how market/state forces create inequalities in socioeconomic well-being at the subnational level (among localities and regions) and among the farm population and rural women in different global settings.
